

Now It's Time to Peel & Break Your's!

We have covered many aspects of creativeness in twelve chapters. Now it is time for you to move on. Through using just a few of the many suggestions each week, in a year's time you will have grown tremendously.

You will generate many more ideas than ever before. You will produce more creative ideas, almosts, answers and solutions too. You will begin to see more creativity than you have ever seen before and request more creativeness from yourself and everyone around you.

The trouble with the last benefit is that it could be an extreme detriment. Because you have expanded and enriched your creativeness you know everyone else can too. The detriment is that they probably do not. They haven't been where you have been or done what you have done.

Vincent van Gogh is a prime example of what might happen when someone completely applies themselves to expanding and enriching a particular skill and in result their creativeness. He committed himself fully to becoming the finest painter he come become, nearly 24 hours a day, for ten years of his life. Such effort would "separate any one from the pack". Packs don't commit to excellence and growth, individuals do.

I am not implying or meaning to say that such a commitment would result in mental illness. Experts still debate about whether his bouts with depression were self-induced by the extreme pressure he put on himself or the result of various physical illnesses he had.

You have begun a wonderful journey, your creative life. Enjoy it. Use it. Share it when you find people who will appreciate it. Each day challenge yourself a little more. Yet at the same time be sure you have balance.

Extreme commitment to developing or expanding one part of your body or nature will produce dramatic results in it, while leaving the majority out of balance. Capitalize on the many aspects of yourself and your nature. Remember to use logic, emotion, and tradition in addition to your creativity and imagination. Remember also to find physical outlets and simply just fun outlets for your energy.

Thank you for joining me on this twelve chapter journey towards your creativeness. My wishes for you are that you will enjoy your new creative life and will help others to do the same, so that some day the entire world will be filled with human creativity added with nature's.
